Impact evaluations in the financial inclusion sector often attempt to measure the financial health of their participants. However, there is little consensus about what financial health consists of and how it should be measured, making it difficult to compare findings about financial health across studies. IPA is developing a standardized set of metrics for measuring financial health that can be used in a variety of contexts. Following initial development, researchers will pilot a questionnaire with these metrics, and then refine a final set of metrics based on the results. The resulting questionnaire will be disseminated broadly for use by practitioners, policymakers, and researchers working to measure financial health across the world.
